Because of this, one major index will be watched very closely this week. On September 2, the S/P 500 Chart index, through tradeStationThe S/P 500, arguably the most important U.S. stock index, hit a record high. Two weeks later, the large capitalization index is testing key support. The S/P 500 index threatens to break below the 50-day average shown in blue. Why does it matter? Big names such as Apple, Amazon and Microsoft may be affected by the moving average, which may act as a key turning point. Traders are waiting to see if the index can keep higher, that moving average; if this happens, it will be a signal to start buying. On the other hand, a breakthrough below this key indicator could trigger a new round of sales pressures that will reduce the stock. Since April 23, the S/P 500 index has not closed below the 50-day average. Note that the volume of the S/P 500 was higher on the days of the fall, shown in red, in contrast to the weekends in recent weeks, shown in green. This is a phenomenon known as distribution and it is considered bearish for stocks in the future. The MACD index, or indicator of the divergence of the average convergence, broke out the sell signal on September 4, highlighted in the circle. Bottom line: Just as the tide lifts all ships, the retreating tide can leave these ships stranded. If the S/P 500 index breaks down, it may take a lot of previously solid names down with it. It's hard to believe that it wasn't quite two weeks ago that people scolded me for this bottom line on the Invesco chart. You might remember a lot of thought that I should start the line on Low March, which I believe they figured would show a line break when the qs were down about $250 on July 24th. My statement then, as it was, since I started drawing in that line back in June, was that this line had so many touches on it that it made it a good line. Fast forward two weeks and hardly anyone who believes the market can go down. You see, two weeks ago, we not only ticked the bottom of this channel line, I also showed you this daily reading chart for put/call ratio (red line) because it spiked to .91, which was the highest it's been since late June. What a difference a seven-day row rally makes. The daily put/call ratio was 0.61 on Thursday, the lowest since June 8, as you can see on the chart. The black line is the GPC. Should they return to the top of the channel? No, they don't. If they disconnect before they make it to the top, you should be seen as changing for the worse in the template. Every time the market has a template that works and that picture changes, we need to be vigilant. Either way, the line is growing, so this week it comes in at about $280; the middle of the week next week, it would be closer to $285, depending on how thick the pencil is. For seven consecutive days, they were green. It's not unprecedented, but it's the longest stretch since they went 11 straight days ago in December. Maybe you noticed that it was the mega-cap technology that was celebrating on Thursday and everything else was overshadowed? You may have noticed that the latitude was negative. You may have noticed that Russell took the day off and closed the day red. And, yes, all the time, people piled into calls, as shown above. Do I think they will reach the top of the channel? Not in the next few days, I don't know. You see, the daily sentiment index for the volatility index is at 10, so if Friday is up to almost 8 points (perhaps, but that would be incredible after the day they were on Thursday), I would expect us to see a bout of volatility before they can mark the top of the channel. I would also point out that the VIX for the Nasdaq was flat on Thursday. It's not that unusual, but it's rare. So perhaps the VIX has seen the rest of the market, while buyers of the call option have only seen s. song charting made easy pdf. charting made incredibly easy pdf. charting made incredibly easy pdf free. charting made incredibly easy pdf free download. charting made incredibly easy pocket guide pdf. charting made incredibly easy pdf download
